

The Great Equality Death of Society

Freedom and equality are inversely related. As one goes up, the other must necessarily go down. Imagine a future world where the dominant political value is equality and where rebellion has become, for all practical purposes, impossible. Meaningful freedom would no longer exist, culture would be dead, and unending drudgery would be the fate of most people, each day.

Of course, there would have to be those who "managed political needs" so that the "common good" could be preserved. These would be, in the words of George Orwell in Animal Farm, a little "more equal" than everybody else.
