

The Game

Some physicists are beginning to believe there is no external reality constituting the fabric of our lives. Instead, they theorize that we are all characters in a grand software simulation, without any meaningful uniqueness or free will. If this theory is true, the Simulator must have installed a highly functioning irony algorithm at the center of its architecture.