

Death of Curiosity

"Twilight" 1934
John W. Campbell

A future world becomes dependent on artificial intelligences, and humans need not do anything for themselves. The most important consequence of this dependence is the atrophy of human intelligence, most importantly the loss of curiosity, arguably the most human of all intellectual attributes. Since they no longer desire to know and do new things, their intellects are truly dead.