

Animals are born with more instincts than man and are more able to survive during infancy. Conversely, man is born with fewer instincts and is therefore more vulnerable at birth and during infancy and must learn more. Ironically, this reality has made man the dominant species.