

A Road Scholar

Some people are really good at navigating their life path. They see all the routes available and study the turn-offs. They learn all the fastest routes and all the most scenic ones. They know what areas are heavily traveled and what areas are treacherous. They know all the speed limits along with all the areas through which they should or must drive more slowly. They make provision for fuel and know where all the gas or recharging stations are. More importantly, they have a place to go and solid and well thought-out reasons for wanting to go there. Most importantly, they have not only realized at a relatively young age that navigating a life path requires both purpose and planning. They have also decided, with an iron-clad will, to pursue their destination goals. This decision includes an acknowledgment that sometimes the journey itself is what's important.
