

What is there about human psychology that it can create such intense personal identification with sports teams and athletes?

It seems that our egos live and die. To what extent can this identification be a healthy or unhealthy distraction?